AN EVENING WALK

Adam and his father went for a walk. It was evening. The clouds were low in the sky. They walked beside a wheat field. They stopped and watched the sun go down.

"The field is pretty," Adam said. It was fresh and green. Birds flew over it. It looked as if the birds were playing. They flew up high. Then they flew low, almost into the grass.

The sky was so big and blue. The clouds were so wide and gray. The world looked very big, which made Adam feel small. He felt like a small speck upon a giant ball.

Adam counted ten birds. "Which kind of birds are those?" he asked.

"They are swallows," his father said. "They are catching bugs. They have to find dinner for their babies back in the nest."

Adam and his father stood there for a long time, watching. Adam put his arm around his father. His father hugged him, which felt good. A bug flew across the field. They watched it until it was out of sight. Then they started walking home.

"I will always love you, Dad," said Adam.

"I will always love you, too," said Adam's father.
